Good grades are important: They ensure that you will be promoted and graduate from high school. They are therefore a prerequisite for an apprenticeship or the desired place at university. But on the way to a B or C on their report card, students sometimes need professional help. But not all parents can afford the necessary tutoring for their children.

To ensure that good education is not a question of money, the German government launched the education and participation package in 2011 - also known as "BuT - Bildung und Teilhabe. Subsidies are available, for example, for school lunches, school trips and private tutoring. The need is great: around 2.5 million children and young people are supported each year.

Many families meet the requirements and do not even know it. There are only two requirements that need to be met:

- You already receive support from the office / job center (e.g. unemployment benefit, housing benefit, social assistance, child supplement, Benefits under the Asylum Seekers' Benefits Act - AsylbLG, etc.)
- The school confirms in writing that the tutoring is necessary (there does not have to be a threat of promotion!).
